Supply Chain & Organizational Behavior Through the Three Lenses Santosh Shanbhag, System Design and Management Program, 2005

Introducing change in any company organization or institution has never been an easy task to accomplish. There is always a resistance to change as change creates confusion in the minds of people, makes them uncomfortable, and requires compromises and adjustments in the way people are used to functioning. However, for the advancement of technology, organizations, society, and life, change is inevitable and will take place sooner or later. This thesis focuses on one such change: change in operational behavior in addressing a new market entry. IC programming socket market by the semiconductor business unit of ACME Inc. The new market entry is done such that the solutions currently provided in the business unit market are made to operate in a larger solution space with minimal changes to the product solution to help maximize profitability of the same. This thesis discusses the differences between the two semiconductor test markets and the similarities between the solutions offered. Further, applying Paul Carlile's approach of using the Three Lenses approach in analyzing an organization (Strategic, Cultural, and Political), the thesis brings out the salient issues in employing the new market entry strategy through an organizational perspective.
