

Chapter 5 Water, Water Everywhere

What is the most important resource on Earth? Would there be life without everything on the ground below? Under the sand? We can't breathe and walk. We can't eat a lot of foods. But there is a great reservoir of water on Earth, and it is everywhere. What makes this possible is that water is recycled through Earth's water cycle, the hydrologic cycle. Although it's present in all places to be covered by water, people don't see much of it because it is sometimes frozen at the poles, or deep underground. Only about 1 percent of all water on Earth is drinkable water that is usable. As human populations continue to grow, more water is becoming a limited resource. How do you get the water you use every day? How does the water get out of the ocean, and change into freshwater?

Evaporation leads to clouds between the atmosphere, land, and water in a process known as the hydrologic or water cycle. Water lifts from the atmosphere as water falls as rain onto land and water. The sun's heat provides energy to evaporate water from Earth's surface water sources, like seas. There, water goes into the air in a process called evaporation. The water rises eventually condenses, forming low clouds in Earth's atmosphere that create rain and snow. Heat precipitation on the land or over the ocean is triggered, and water returns to the land or over the ocean of the precipitation falls into the ground. Some of the water percolates into the ground, and some runs off the ground. The water that runs off the ground is called runoff, and some of the water flows down rivers into the ocean, eventually returning to the sea.

Water travels over land through streams. Whenever you see an Earth surface not wet by the ocean, you see it a waterbody, even if it's small. It's essential to the land you stand. Without surface runoff, there would be no rivers, streams, lakes, ponds or other bodies of water.
