Lesson 1: The Continental Drift Hypothesis

A. Pangaea

1. The German scientist Alfred Wegener studied whether Earth's continents move.
2. Wegener proposed that all continents were once part of a single supercontinent called Pangaea.
  - a. Over time, Pangaea started breaking apart, and the continents started moving to where they are now.
  - b. The hypothesis that suggests that continents are in constant motion on Earth's surface is continental drift.
3. Wegener observed the similarities of coastlines between continents that were separated by oceans.
4. The continents that once formed Pangaea have coasts that fit together like pieces of a(n) puzzle.

B. Evidence That Continents Move

1. Fossils of ancient plants and animals provide evidence for continental drift.
2. Remains of the same plants and animals are present on different continents that are now separated by oceans.
3. Fossils of plants and animals that lived in wet, warm climates are in areas that now have cold climates.
4. Deposits of coal in Antarctica are evidence of continental drift. The fossilized plants in these deposits show that Antarctica was once near the equator.
5. Wegener proposed that certain continents—including South America and Australia—were closer to the South Pole 250 million years ago.
  - a. Wegener suggested that these continents were covered by a large ice sheet.
  - b. Today, all these continents except one are near the equator, where the climate is warm enough to melt ice sheets.
6. Glacial grooves on continents that currently have warm climates show that these continents once had cold climates.
7. Wegener observed that there were mountains and rocks on different continents that shared common origins.
8. Evidence of continental drift also includes rocks on different continents that have similar or identical chemistry, geologic structure, and age.
9. If you pushed North America and Europe together again, their mountains would look like one long belt with the same rock types.
