Sandra O'Donnell,2018-05-23 What is the difference between a writer who never finds an agent or sells their manuscript to a publisher and an author who becomes a best seller

The first fifteen pages If you have been sending out queries and wonder why your manuscript hasn't grabbed the interest of an agent the answer might be in the first fifteen pages you submitted Why Because quite simply most submissions are missing one or more of the crucial elements of storytelling that capture and hold readers' attention The job the explicit goal of those critical first fifteen pages is to hook agents editors and ultimately readers Those first pages need to grab us if not by the collar at least by the sleeve and say I've got you Keep reading If your first fifteen pages don't do that your manuscript won't make it past an agent's slush pile and your book will never land in the hands of a reader or brighten the screen of their Kindles As a literary agent I've read thousands of queries and thousands of beginning pages I've learned what makes a submission sing sending me back to the author's query to find an email so I can ask for more And I've learned what causes me more often than not to push Send on a passed with love email I loathe having to send those thanks but no thanks responses to a writer's work I don't know any agent who looks forward to the opportunity to gleefully kill the dreams of someone who has spent years toiling away on a book Fifteen pages may seem an unfairly short or arbitrary number of pages to determine if the writing or the story is worth pursuing But honestly by reading the first fifteen pages of a manuscript I know what I need to know which is If the writing is fresh beautifully wrought moving or exceptional What drove the story into being the inciting incident Who the main characters are and what makes them interesting and distinct When and where the story is set the time frame place or historical period The genre is the story a romance set in Tuscany a WWII revisionist history a coming of age LGBTQ a YA dystopian set in the past or commercial fiction about life after death If the point of view feels right for the story If the writer is the only person who has read the manuscript a dead give away is a manuscript riddled with grammatical errors with big holes in the story And most importantly we know if it is a story we are passionate about or at least excited enough about after fifteen pages to ask for the full manuscript If we aren't into your story by page fifteen our attention wanders and after that it is very difficult to get the reader back I can hear many of you groaning My story is special I need more time to develop my characters to give a backstory to build tension to pile on all the things I learned in writing classes Actually you don't All you need to introduce the essential elements the who what where when and most importantly the why of your story are the first fifteen pages In this book I back up my reasons for concentrating on the first fifteen pages by sharing examples from the bestselling novels in a variety of genres You don't have to take my word for it Read the first two chapters of this book and then pick up your favorite book in your favorite genre Read the first fifteen pages See for yourself what drew you to the book and why you kept reading This book is for beginning writers AND for those who have a pile of thanks but no thanks rejections sitting in their inbox It is for the novice writer with an inkling of a book idea AND for those who've heard crickets from all the queries they've sent out It is for those who dream of being on a bestseller list or winning a major book award AND for those who want to write the best book possible and see where it takes them
