

Are zebra mussels really invading?

Since the zebra mussel invasion began in the early 1990s, scientists have been worried that the species is an exotic invader that could cause an effect similar to the exotic mussel species introduced to the Great Lakes. In 2003, a study led by the University of Wisconsin-Madison, the United States and other researchers reported that zebra mussels had reduced a million eggs daily from native mussels within 100 days of invasion, and predicted that native mussel populations in the Great Lakes may progressively decline as zebra mussels continue their invasion.

By 2006, including eight other Great Lakes, zebra mussels were estimated to have reduced the native mussel population by 20% to 30% in 17 of the Great Lakes. The study also reported that zebra mussels are the dominant or most abundant species in 17 of the Great Lakes. The study also reported that zebra mussels had reduced the native mussel population by 20% to 30% in 17 of the Great Lakes. The study also reported that zebra mussels had reduced the native mussel population by 20% to 30% in 17 of the Great Lakes.

The zebra mussel's size, reproductive strategy, and ability to fast-track individuals may give zebra mussels a competitive advantage. Zebra mussels attach themselves to hard surfaces, like bridges, and they grow very fast. They also filter water, which helps them avoid the competition and growth problems that other species, like native mussels, face. Zebra mussels also have a high survival rate in harsh conditions, like cold water.
