Research Priorities of Forensic Occupational Therapy Kate Auer, 2017 Research priorities in forensic occupational therapy in England have been published by Duncan Munro Nicol 2003 There have been no such studies conducted in the United States A survey was released to forensic occupational therapists in the United States to determine the research topics with the highest priorities The top three research priorities identified by participants were gaining engagement in group activities gaining engagement in individual activities and occupational deprivation The open response question also revealed gaining engagement in group activities 27% of participants as a top priority along with occupational deprivation 18% and vocational 18% Much of occupational therapy intervention in forensic settings occurs in group settings which is likely why this showed up as needing the most research Occupational deprivation and vocations are also themes that occupational therapists work on with many different populations which proves the need for research on these topics Given our results the research priorities have been identified so the next step would be further research and evidence for forensic occupational therapy practice
