Secondary towns, agricultural prices, and intensification: Evidence from Ethiopia Vandecasteele, Joachim, Tamru, Seneshaw, Minten, Bart, Swinnen, Johan, 2017-03-01 Urbanization is happening fast in the developing world and especially so in sub-Saharan Africa where growth rates of cities are among the highest in the world. While cities and in particular secondary towns where most of the urban population in sub-Saharan Africa resides affect agricultural practices in their rural hinterlands, this relationship is not well understood. To fill this gap, we develop a conceptual model to analyze how farmers' proximity to cities of different sizes affects agricultural prices and intensification of farming. We then test these predictions using large-scale survey data from producers of teff, a major staple crop in Ethiopia, relying on unique data on transport costs and road networks and implementing an array of econometric models. We find that agricultural price behavior and intensification is determined by proximity to a city and the type of city. While proximity to cities has a strong positive effect on agricultural output prices and on uptake of modern inputs and yields on farms, the effects on prices and intensification measures are lower for farmers in the rural hinterlands of secondary towns compared to primate cities.

Patterns of agricultural production among male and female holders Kasa, Leulseged, Warner, James, Kieran, Caitlin, 2015-12-08 Gender inequities present a major barrier to increased agricultural production and food security in Ethiopia. However, a lack of nationally representative sex disaggregated data and analysis hinders the development and implementation of evidence-based policies. This report aims to contribute to filling this gap by presenting a gender analysis of the Ethiopian Central Statistics Agency's Agricultural Sample Survey (AgSS) data collected between 2010 and 2013. The analysis reveals clear gender gaps between male and female holders in terms of human capital, natural capital, financial capital, agricultural input use, and participation in crop production and livestock husbandry. Specifically, female holders are less educated, have less family labor, own and manage less land, and are less likely to cultivate rented land compared to male holders. Concurrently, female holders have limited access to extension and advisory services and therefore to knowledge and information concerning best agronomic practices. Compared to male holders, female holders are less likely to cultivate commercial and economically valuable crops. This difference substantially contributes to the gender resource gap since these crops generate a higher market value than traditional staple crops. Moreover, a significantly lower proportion of female holders reported ownership of livestock, especially oxen and equines, which are the primary sources of draught power for plowing and transportation in rural Ethiopia. Overall, this report identifies significant differences in the patterns of agricultural production of male and female holders in Ethiopia and calls for closing these gender gaps because it would yield enormous benefits at the individual household and national levels. The report also puts forward policy priorities for prospective interventions.

Cropland expansion in Ethiopia: Economic and climatic considerations for highland agriculture Schmidt, Emily, Thomas, Timothy S., 2018-11-22 Agricultural GDP in Ethiopia grew at an average 7.3 percent per year between 2001-02 and 2012-13. Most of this dynamism occurred in the highlands where high population density and land scarcity begs the question of how future agricultural output can be maintained to sustain the previous decade's momentum. This paper uses a spatial regression approach to calculate the maximum crop area potential of each kebele in Ethiopia. We find that although the highlands have a greater potential for cropped area, there is little room to expand. A substantial share of the highlands has limited economic potential to expand the land base devoted to agriculture. In fact, many areas may be reaching an environmental threshold that will require the local agricultural land area to contract to maintain the agricultural productivity outcomes realized in previous years.

The Oxford Handbook of the Ethiopian Economy Fantu Cheru,Christopher Cramer,Arkebe Oqubay,2019-01-10 From a war torn and famine plagued country at the beginning of the 1990s Ethiopia is today emerging as one of the fastest growing economies in Africa Growth in Ethiopia has surpassed that of every other sub Saharan country over the past decade and is forecast by the International Monetary Fund to exceed 8 percent over the next two years The government has set its eyes on transforming the country into a middle income country by 2025 and into a leading manufacturing hub in Africa The Oxford Handbook of the Ethiopian Economy studies this country s unique model of development where the state plays a central role and where a successful industrialization drive has challenged the long held erroneous assumption that industrial policy will never work in poor African countries While much of the volume is focused on post 1991 economic development policy and strategy the analysis is set against the background of the long history of Ethiopia and more specifically on the Imperial period that ended in 1974 the socialist development experiment of the Derg regime between 1974 and 1991 and the policies and strategies of the current EPRDF government that assumed power in 1991 Including a range of contributions from both academic and professional standpoints this volume is a key reference work on the economy of Ethiopia

Row planting teff in Ethiopia Vandecasteele, Joachim,Dereje, Mekdim,Minten, Bart,Taffesse, Alemayehu Seyoum,2016-07-01 Improved technologies are increasingly promoted to farmers in sub Saharan African countries to address low agricultural productivity in their staple crops There is however a lack of evidence on how adoption affects farmers labor use and profitability at the farm level as well as the importance gender roles play all essential drivers for the successful up scaling of the use of the improved technologies This paper analyses the labor and profitability impact of the recently introduced row planting technology in teff production in Ethiopia Based on agronomic evidence in experimental settings the Government of Ethiopia has focused extension efforts on promoting the widespread uptake of row planting to address low teff yields replacing the traditional broadcasting method of plant teff Using an innovative Randomized Controlled Trial set up we show that the implementation of row planting at the farm level significantly increases total labor use but not teff yields relative to broadcast planting resulting in a substantial drop in labor productivity when adopting row planting Moreover the implementation of row planting has important consequences for inter and intra household labor allocation with relatively more use of non family labor The adoption of row planting was further found not to be profitable for farmers in the first year of the promotion campaign seemingly explaining the limited success in up scaling the adoption of the technology by farmers in the second year of the program

National gender profile of agriculture and rural livelihoods Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations,2023-08-07 In Angola around 80 percent of farmers are smallholders so the agriculture sector still represents an important source of income employment and food for a large part of the production Women constitute the majority of the labour force in agriculture and are critical agents of change in the fight against rural poverty hunger and malnutrition In Angola 4 8 million women live in rural areas and the 38 3 percent of the country s women have agriculture as their main activity However inequalities in access to land agricultural inputs training and knowledge limit their contribution to agricultural productivity and economic development At community level women have low participation in decision making Angola has made consistent efforts to address existing gender inequalities in the agriculture and labour sectors given the important role that women play in agriculture and the country s food systems Although gender mainstreaming in agriculture and rural development sectors is in its early stages in recent years progress has been made to benefit women more consistently This assessment revealed that gender inequalities remain widespread and particularly evident in rural areas despite the progress made in establishing a legal and policy framework for advancing women s rights and gender equality

Farmers' preferences for climate-smart agriculture Taneja, Garima,Pal, Barun Deb,Joshi, Pramod Kumar,Aggarwal, Pramod K.,Tyagi, N. K.,2014-04-02 This study was undertaken to assess farmers preferences and willingness to pay WTP for various climate smart interventions in the Indo Gangetic Plain The research outputs will be helpful in integrating farmers choices with government programs in the selected regions The Indo Gangetic Plain IGP was selected because it is highly vulnerable to climate change which may adversely affect the sustainability of the rice wheat production system and the food security of the region Climate smart agriculture CSA can mitigate the negative impacts of climate change and improve the efficiency of the rice wheat based production system CSA requires a complete package of practices to achieve the desired objectives but adoption is largely dependent on farmers preferences and their capacity and WTP To assess farmers choices and their WTP for the potential climate smart technologies and other interventions we used scoring and bidding protocols implemented through focus group meetings in two distinct regions of Eastern and Western IGP We find that laser land leveling LLL crop insurance and weather advisory services were the preferred interventions in Eastern IGP Farmers preferred LLL direct seeding zero tillage irrigation scheduling and crop insurance in Western IGP Through the bidding approach farmers implicitly express their WTP for new technologies that could transform current agricultural practices into relatively low carbon and more productive farming methods But actual large scale adoption of the preferred climate smart technologies and other interventions would require access to funding as well as capacity building among technology promoters and users

Optimizing the Delivery of Multiple Ecosystem Goods and Services in Agricultural Systems Maria A. Tsiafouli, Evangelia G. Drakou, Alberto Orgiazzi, Katarina Hedlund, Karl Ritz, 2017-10-18 Agricultural land is subjected to a variety of societal pressures as demands for food animal feed and biomass production increase with an added requirement to simultaneously maintain natural areas and mitigate climatic and environmental impacts The biotic elements of agricultural systems interact with the abiotic environment to generate a number of ecosystem functions that offer services benefiting humans across many scales of time and space The intensification of agriculture generally reduces biodiversity including that within soil and impacts negatively upon a number of regulating and supporting ecosystem services There is a global need toward achieving sustainable agricultural systems as also highlighted in the United Nations Sustainable Development Goals There is hence a need for management regimes that enhance both agricultural production and the associated provision of multiple ecosystem services The articles of this Research Topic enhance our knowledge of how management practices applied to agricultural systems affect the delivery of multiple ecosystem services and how trade offs between provisioning regulating and supporting services can be handled both above and below ground They also show the diversity of topics that need to be considered within the framework of ecosystem services delivered by agricultural systems from knowledge on basic concepts and newly proposed frameworks to a focus on specific ecosystem types such as grasslands and high nature value farmlands pollinator habitats and soil habitats This diversity of topics indicates the need for broader scope research integrated with targeted scientific research to promote sustainable agricultural practices and to ensure food security
