

Oh Deer, Here Come the Wolves!

Imagine yourself as wildlife manager working to restore the population of an endangered species of deer. Currently, the female elk have a great season, resulting in a high percentage of females surviving to produce offspring. This is healthy, but think of the following scenarios. Do you think each predator has been admitted for your herd of deer?

Scenario 1: The female elk have a high pregnancy rate, but the offspring are born at a low rate, which has decreased significantly. Contributing this species to extinction. A biological survey conducted across parts of the herd is providing predators about 50% more elk offspring than healthy offspring raised by normal deer. This is because the predators are eating the offspring as they are born. How, the biologist is suggesting, can the population be growing slowly but steadily? How can wildlife managers be planning for potential extinction now? What do you think is contributing to the decline in the herd? How does predation affect the population? Do you think predation is just triggering the decline or is it contributing to the decline? What are the effects of the predators on the population growth of the herd?

Scenario 2: The female elk have a high pregnancy rate, but the offspring are born at a low rate, which has decreased significantly. Contributing this species to extinction. A biological survey conducted across parts of the herd is providing predators about 50% more elk offspring than healthy offspring raised by normal deer. This is because the predators are eating the offspring as they are born. How, the biologist is suggesting, can the population be growing slowly but steadily?
