Sulzer Two-stroke Marine Diesel Engines for Ice-breaking Cargo Ships E. Höhener, Egon G. Faber, 1983 Sulzer is persuaded that two stroke cross head engines are suitable and economic prime movers for large size arctic merchant vessels It is however a fact that any diesel machinery arrangement designed to deal with arctic requirements would be more sophisticated than installations for open sea operation only For smaller sized vessels and special ships such as pure icebreakers Sulzer has the widest background of arctic experiences of any diesel engine designer All those vessels have been equipped with medium speed engines of 4 stroke or 2 stroke design For future ship projects of this size and duty requiring up to some 50 000 BHP total output Sulzer will continue to recommend the reliable medium speed Z ZA engine as prime mover Solutions for diesel propelled merchant ships for arctic conditions are mainly influenced by the individual power requirements and the ambient conditions It is essential to go somewhat deeper into this for most engine operators a well known topic than one would normally do to explain solutions for engine arrangement in ship installations and its operation The main problem was to obtain the torque characteristic dictated by the fixed pitch propeller ideal for ice milling by an engine not capable of producing torque at low or even zero speed The solution was the diesel electric power transmission with an electric motor driving the propeller having a similar torque characteristic as the steam engine Physically the diesel electric power transmission works as a torque converter The question was open whether there would be an alternative torque converter or not realistic solutions could have been Hydraulic torque converter between diesel engines and propeller Fitting a controllable pitch propeller For the high shaft ratings required only the controllable pitch propeller solution is feasible The present state of the art concerning cp propellers knows how to deal with arctic ice requirements and service experience exists Sulzer is persuaded that two stroke cross head engines are suitable and economic prime movers for large size arctic merchant vessels It is however a fact that any diesel machinery arrangement designed to deal with arctic requirements would be more sophisticated than installations for open sea operation only For smaller sized vessels and special ships such as pure icebreakers Sulzer has the widest background of arctic experiences of any diesel engine designer All those vessels have been equipped with medium speed engines of 4 stroke or 2 stroke design For future ship projects of this size and duty requiring up to some 50000 BHP total output Sulzer will continue to recommend the reliable medium speed Z ZA engine as prime mover Solutions for diesel propelled merchant ships for arctic conditions are mainly influenced by the individual power requirements and the ambient conditions It is essential to go somewhat deeper into this for most engine operators a well known topic than one would normally do to explain solutions for engine arrangement in ship installations and its operation ASTIS database The new Sulzer marine diesel engine RND type Sulzer Brothers, 1968
