Abstract—this paper presents a method to instruct students on how to write their first scientific paper. The method adopts a holistic approach that discusses several different aspects of paper writing. Covered issues include the choice of the paper subject, hypothesis formulation and the design of experiments to test it, the collection and analysis of data, and the planning and writing of the final text. The method has been successfully used to teach graduate and undergraduate students to write their first articles.

Keywords—writing; paper writing; scientific method

I. INTRODUCTION

Engineers normally do not receive formal training in writing skills, at least not extensively. This is possibly the reason why the second chapter of Carl Selinger's book (Stuff You Don't Learn in Engineering School [1]) is about writing. It is true that communication skills, especially written communication skills, may affect the professional success of engineers.

Scientific paper writing is more complex than just writing. This complexity arises from the fact that paper writing involves reporting scientific advances. The process involves several aspects, such as formulating a hypothesis, proposing an experiment to test it, executing the experiment, collecting data and analyzing the data to judge the hypothesis and finally writing a report about the whole process. The final report has also to consider the writing tradition of a given community.

Due to the multiple aspects involved in scientific paper writing, material devoted to teach this skill normally focus more on a single aspect, or they are too extensive. This paper proposes a short introduction to paper writing, contemplating a broad variety of associated topics and skills, yet in a concise and practical way.

This paper is organized as follows. Section II presents describes the concept of new knowledge and how it is produced. Advice for conducting the process of investigation of hypotheses is given in section III. The writing of the report is discussed in Section IV; while Section V provides advice to deal with scientific communities. Finally, conclusions are presented in section VI.

II. UNDERSTANDING AND MANAGING THE PROCESS

Writing a scientific paper is a process that need some time for maturing the contents of the paper. Understanding the process helps to produce better papers. This section provides insights on how new knowledge is produced.

A. Dealing with New Knowledge

Article writing is about new knowledge, as a paper is supposed to advance the scientific knowledge. This means that imagination plays an important role in scientific discovery. The ability to imagine new things relies on divergent thinking [2], which implies in being able to associate ideas that normally would not be associated. This is difficult to admit for people starting in science, as normally students are educated in such a way that they study a book chapter; and then they are tested to check if they have learnt the contents of the chapter. This is done normally with a set of exercises that test if the student understood what was taught and if (s)he is able to use the knowledge from the chapter, which is a well established knowledge. This kind of thinking is called convergent thinking [2]. Fig. 1 illustrates the concept that new knowledge has to be imagined outside the sum of all human knowledge; this is the case of new idea $n1$, in Fig. 1. Notice that in the more frequent cases, a person imagines something that is new for the person, but it is not new to humankind; this is the case of new idea $n1'$ in Fig. 1.

Figure 1. New knowledge has to be imagined first

B. Knowing the Frontier of Knowledge

Imagination, or divergent thinking, is an important part of research. However, it is not the only important part. In fact to decide if a product of our imagination is new to us or for a field of knowledge it is necessary to know the field. For this, it is necessary to read and compare. Reading is necessary, in order to: (1) understand which is new in each paper, (2) to establish what the contribution of the paper is, (3) to be able to compare
