Accounting Information Systems

QUESTIONS

1. The five fundamental principles of accounting information systems are: (a) scope of principle, (b) relevance principle, (c) comparability principle, (d) flexibility principle, and (e) confidentiality principle.
2. The five components of an accounting system are source documents, input devices, information processing, information storage, and output devices.
3. Source documents contain data about business transactions or events that are fed into the processing system and processed. Examples of source documents are invoices from suppliers, checks received from customers, and payroll forms filled out by employees.
4. An input device is used to transfer data from source documents to the information processing. Examples of input devices for computer systems include keyboards, scanners, and bar-code readers.
5. Data stored "off-line" are not immediately available to the information processor(s), while "on-line" data are immediately available.
6. Output devices produce the reports by which information is taken from the accounting system and made available for use.
7. Three types of transactions usually recorded in special journals are: (a) sales on credit, (b) purchases on credit, (c) cash receipts, and (d) cash disbursements.
8. The (a) initial and (b) page numbers of the journal from which the accounting period is covered is the Printing Reference column of the ledger accounts.
9. The double posting does not occur the trial balance as the use of business because only one credit is posted to the general ledger—the subsidiary ledger posting used to balance accounts—the trial balance (they give double of general ledger accounts).
10. When copies of the sales invoices are recorded in sales journal, each invoice listed is posted to the sales subsidiary account in the subsidiary accounts, Subsidiary Ledger, after which the invoices are closed in general ledger. Thus at the end of the period the general ledger copies are closed automatically divided to Accounts Receivable and credited to Sales. This method is called double posting of sales invoices.
