Bedard,2014 While many audit firms have adopted electronic systems for workpaper preparation and review in hopes of improving both efficiency and effectiveness prior research shows that the expected gains may be difficult to achieve In order to investigate possible sources of difficulty in full use of these systems in audit practice this paper identifies individual task components involved in workpaper preparation and review We assess the relative difficulty of performing the individual component tasks and examine the quot learning curvequot by relating difficulty ratings to performance frequency We also assess which component tasks are more difficult in an electronic versus a paper environment and measure auditor resistance to the electronic system after one to two years of use Using survey data from auditors at an international audit firm that recently adopted an electronic workpaper system we find that tasks involving quot navigationquot around the electronic system e g agreeing lead sheets with workpapers are the most difficult for auditors to accomplish Audit managers and partners express greater difficulty with the electronic system and report using fewer of the capabilities of the system relative to staff and seniors Finally we present reported incidence of quot working aroundquot the system including behaviors such as creating review notes and storing workpapers outside the system The difficulties that we document present possible implications for complying with professional standards such as Auditing Standard No 3 on audit documentation Our results are useful to audit practice in targeting training efforts and to research in providing topics for study of decision improvement Audit Report Manual United States.
