

SAVAGE MODEL 1919 NRA TARGET RIFLE

By DENNIS BURMAN

Bolt-action rifles were not very popular in the U.S. until World War I when a large number of soldiers used British Springfield and Mauser bolt-action rifles and expressed a liking for this type of rifle. Following the war, U.S. rifle manufacturers began to offer several models of bolt-action rifles to meet popular demand. One of these rifles, the Savage Model 1919 NRA, was of military style with a long barrel, NRA in the stock action was replaced by Savage Target Rifle. It is interesting that the rifle was marketed for being more accurate than the previous bolt-action in National Rifle Association rifles.

This bolt-action target rifle was offered in 2 chamberings, .22 long rifle and .22 short. The rifle chambered for .22 short was made on special order to save the tooling cost and is not seen.

In both chamberings, the rifle had a 27" barrel length and weighed approximately 7 lbs. The Savage bolt had a maximum forward travel and the bolt handle on the rear garden turned in a locking lug. A bolted head on the locking plate prevented normal locking without turning the bolt.

Cartridges were fed from a forward magazine that tapered with a bolted head on the bottom to facilitate loading. The magazine-feed tube was on the right of the action behind the bolt handle. An aperture rear sight with screw adjustments for windage and elevation was mounted on the upper part of the action, and the front sight was mounted on the barrel.

An unusual feature was that the barrel and receiver were integral. Non-removal was the Savage action. The cartridge case was seated in 2 positions to aid in bolt opening.

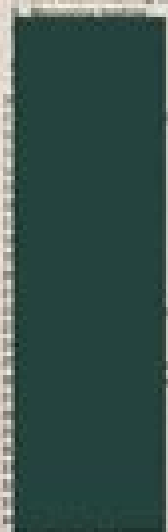

Of interesting design, the bolt-handle action made with pistol grip was fitted with a steel trigger. This provided more 1 1/2" drop action, 2 millimeter forward travel, and gripping pressure in the forward.

A later version on right of the rifle with serial numbers ranging from 20000 to 40000 had a magazine action, improvements, and several other action modifications. The original and later versions were essentially alike in external appearance, however.

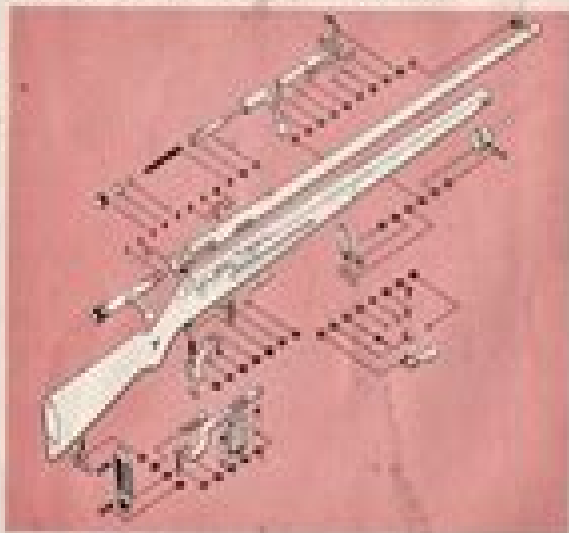

In 1922, the rifle was replaced by the Savage Model 19-22 target rifle, featuring a special bolt, self-propagating ball neck and other improvements.
