Absorption - Energy from the wave is transferred to a material's store (usually leading to heating).

Transmission - Waves carry on traveling through a material e.g. light waves in glass. "Glass transmits light waves".

Reflection - Waves bounce back from a material. An echo is a reflected sound wave.

Refraction - When waves travel through different materials their speed can change. When light travels through water or glass, it slows down as it enters. This causes its direction to change. We say the wave is refracted towards the normal. The normal is an imaginary line which is 90° to the surface where the light entered.

When light enters a block, the waves refract towards the normal as the wave slows down.

When the light exits the block, the wave refracts away from the normal as the wave speeds up.

How to measure the speed of sound in air:

Set up a signal generator, speaker, 2 microphones and an oscilloscope like below. The oscilloscope shows the sound wave on a screen.

Move 1 microphone backwards (with the speaker still emitting the same sound) until the waves line up again on the screen. You have moved the microphone 1 wavelength and you can measure the wavelength of the wave.

The signal generator emits a sound at a specific frequency. Use the wave equation:

$v = f \lambda$  (You know the wavelength and frequency) to find the velocity of the wave. The speed of sound in air is roughly 340m/s.

Speed of sound in a solid:

When metals are hit they produce a sound. In a metal rod, the wavelength will always be equal to double the length of the rod (which is why smaller rods sound higher pitched). You can use a microphone connected to a computer to find the frequency of the sound produced. Using the wave equation the speed of the sound can be calculated.

Purple

Refraction PAG:

By directing light at a rectangular block and drawing the ray of light, you can measure the angle of incidence and refraction. Where the light entered and exited the block, a line was drawn at 90° to the surface (the normal). Angles are always measured from this normal.

It is easy to see that light can be refracted however every wave can be refracted.

Refraction:

When waves enter a new material, they change speed. As the frequency won't change, the wavelength will. The diagram shows that the wavelength gets smaller as the wave enters material 2 because its speed has got smaller. This wave did not change direction because it went in at 90° to the surface (along the normal).
