

Chapter 7.

PROCESS COSTING.

---

Chapter Goals:

After the study, you should understand:

- (1) The process costing and the situation where it is employed.
  - (2) Difference between process costing and job costing.
  - (3) Collection of data for process costing.
  - (4) The cost of production report.
  - (5) Treatment of normal and abnormal losses.
  - (6) Treatment when addition of materials increases number of units.
  - (7) Work in process beginning inventory and cost of production report.

In job costing, where production is in response of customers' orders and each order has its own peculiar specifications, emphasis of cost accountant is on identification of costs with units of output. But in industries engaged in mass production of standard products e.g. cement, washing powder, sugar etc. it is neither possible to distinguish cost of one unit from the other nor does it serve my useful purpose. All units of output are exactly similar and an average unit cost, obtained by dividing total cost by total output of the period, is sufficient to serve managerial needs. In such situations process costing system is adopted. Manufacturing operations of industries employing process costing are generally departmentalized. Each department, also called a process, performs a set of manufacturing operations and transfers partly finished product to the next department until the finished product is produced.
