

SELLING SERVICE WORK

Service, like any other commodity, has to be sold to the prospective customer. The selling of Schwinn Quality service is made easier if the customer receives a favorable first impression. He will note and appreciate any help he receives with the unloading of his bicycle, the fact that his ideas and opinions are listened to, and a friendly, personal approach during the entire service transaction.

The first steps in the service transaction center around the checking of the bicycle and the filling out of the repair tag in the customer service area. Fill in the customer's name and address and other identifying information. Let the customer tell you what he thinks is wrong and what service he wants. Next, go over the bicycle yourself to see if other work is needed. Use the following figures to locate areas of possible damage and wear.

Make it a point to explain to the customer, in simple terms, what service work is needed and how this service will benefit him. If the customer has brought in only a wheel, encourage him to bring in the bicycle so that the wheel can be installed properly and the rest of the bicycle checked.

Special attention should be given to women who bring in service work. Women, more than men, will respond to helpful, courteous service. Although women probably know less about the technical aspects of bicycle service, they will still appreciate some information on what will be done in the shop. However, they will resent anything which they feel is an effort to confuse or bewilder them. So keep the explanations simple and to the point.

The last steps in this initial customer contact include filling in the estimated costs and pickup time on the claim tag portion of the repair tag and giving the claim tag to the customer.
