WEATHER FORECASTING

Everybody talks about the weather but no one does anything about it. This statement (attributed to Mark Twain) expresses our dependence on weather and our inability to control it. If people cannot change the weather, at least they can improve their ability to predict weather and prepare for weather events. Weather forecasting has improved dramatically over the past century. Meteorologists can now predict the weather several days in advance with remarkable accuracy. However, there are limitations on their ability to predict future weather.

For many centuries, people depended on their limited understanding of weather to forecast weather events. Red sky at night, sailors delight. Red sky in the morning, sailors take warning. These statements are based on the observation that a buildup of clouds in the morning commonly occurs before a storm. However, individual observations at one location may not give enough information to make forecasts accurate for more than a few hours into the future.

That picture began to change about a century ago. Electronic communications, including telegraph and radio, ex-
