

Examples of Logos, Ethos, Pathos, and Kairos in the Adams Essay

We discussed some examples of the four rhetorical appeals in the essay by Gordon Adams, "Petition to Waive the University Mathematics Requirement":

Logos (Logic)

Adams effectively argues that the ASU math requirement makes little sense to his case. He also throws back the answers from the department chair that confirm that the skills taught in these two math classes will never be applicable to his profession.

Ethos (Credibility)

He proves that he has drive and initiative — he recalls his ability to enter and succeed in college without having earned a high school diploma, he proudly reveals his 3.9 GPA and academic honors, he identifies his ambition for law school, and he strives to be a leader to his people. He doesn't seem like some slacker just trying to get out of hard work, so this author establishes his credibility well. He also takes the initiative to anticipate the questions that the committee members might ask and he asks those questions himself to the department chairs and attorneys in the field to reveal their answers in his favor. He further proves that he can use functional math skills in the real world when he recalls his 15-year career in construction and his successful business operations.

Pathos (Emotion)

He applies a guilt trip on the committee — he recalls ASU's claim that they go out of their way to assist Native Americans, yet he questions how adhering to the math requirement in his case promotes Native American outreach. He also makes the reader feel proud for this man's accomplishments, which further promotes sympathy from the audience.

Kairos (Timeliness)

He argues that time is of the essence — that a one-year delay will delay legal services to an entire tribe of people, which would cause further harm to his community (he mentions the drug and alcohol abuse rates and claims federal discrimination against his tribe that are not being addressed due to their lack of legal counsel).
