Questions 1 to 3 are based on this passage.

Many baseball enthusiasts are aware of the story of how Abner Doubleday invented the game of baseball with some friends in 1839 and introduced it to a nation during the Civil War. However, most baseball historians now agree that this story is a convenient fiction, propagated by Albert Spalding, a player, manager, owner, and one of the first manufacturers of sporting equipment. Spalding's desire to distinguish baseball, which so keenly mirrored American interests and pursuits, from similar games played in England, such as cricket and rounders, led Spalding to seek out a purely North American origin of the sport. Spalding's entire basis for the foundation of baseball history lay in a handwritten letter from 1907 that he said came from a man who claimed to have gone to school with Doubleday and attributed the invention to him. Despite the speculative and dubious claims of the letter, Spalding and other members of his commission were quick to adopt the narrative as gospel and began to market their sport to the masses as a truly American pursuit.

1. Which of the following statements is suggested by the passage?

- Abner Doubleday did invent the game of baseball.
- Claiming baseball to be invented by an American would help Spalding sell more sporting equipment.
- Baseball is not truly an American sport.
- Many people in Spalding's day wanted to believe baseball was invented by an American.
- The other members of Spalding's commission knew that the letter about Abner Doubleday was probably fraudulent.
